Do you know a child who...

- Is having difficulty with reading or math?
- Is receiving failing grades in school?
- Shows behavior problems in school?
- Is having trouble paying attention in class?
- Is unable to keep up with schoolwork?
- Hates going to school?
- Is having trouble learning letter names and sounds?
- Is disorganized and doesn't complete work?
- Appears unhappy much of the time?
- Doesn't understand what he or she reads?
- Has trouble remembering or following directions?
- Daydreams during class?

A psychoeducational evaluation can help answer these and other questions for individuals experiencing difficulties in school.

The Psychoeducational Clinic

Temple University's psycho-educational clinic provides comprehensive psychoeducational evaluations for children, adolescents, and young adults who are experiencing academic difficulties. These difficulties may be related to behavioral, social, or emotional problems, learning disabilities, or neurological impairment.

The evaluation process consists of five three hour sessions and includes the following components:

- An interview with the parents or guardian regarding the child's background and academic history.
- A classroom observation and interview with the child's teacher(s).
- A battery of tests to assess some or all of the following areas: cognition, perception, attention, information processing, adaptive behavior, academic achievement, personality, and social, emotional and behavioral functioning.
- A final interview with the parents or guardians to share the evaluation results and recommendations for home and school. A written report is also provided.

Clinicians

The Psychoeducational Clinic is staffed by graduate students in the School Psychology Program at Temple University. These students are observed and supervised by experienced, doctoral level certified and licensed school psychologists.

Fee

Evaluations are available at affordable rates on a sliding scale, based on the family's ability to pay. Unfortunately, credit cards and medical insurance are not accepted.
